

OpEd for International Migrants Day (801 Words)

Let your Light Shine

By William Lacy Swing, Director General, IOM

We have seen some dark days in our world this year. In 2015 we have seen acts of sickening violence, the fury of nature, and – perhaps most poignant of all – the corpse of a Syrian baby boy, Aylan Kurdi, face-down on a Mediterranean beach.

But while the world is full of darkness, it is not surprising that so many cultures have created festivals of light. Hindus recently celebrated Diwali, and last month was Loy Krathong in Southeast Asia, where candles were set afloat to give thanks. Soon it will be the holiday season for much of the Western world. Lights are already twinkling almost everywhere, from Central Park to Bondi Beach.

In Ireland, a nation which fled poverty, war and famine, there is a tradition of placing a candle in the window during the holiday season, to remember the emigrants who now live far away. Now it should perhaps remind us of the thousands of families fleeing conflict in the Middle East and seeking the light of a safe haven in Europe.

As an issue, migration defined 2015. It was a year of mass and rapid population movement. Conflicts in Syria, Iraq, Afghanistan, Somalia, Yemen and South Sudan; a typhoon in Vanuatu; an earthquake in Nepal; and some 900,000 migrants arriving by boat in Europe fleeing war, poverty, and persecution: the world was in flux from the mountains to the deserts to the oceans.

In an ignorant panic, sections of media and society have sought to paint migration as a social evil: a divider of families and communities, a spawning ground for fanaticism. And after many decades of watching and commenting on migration, I am increasingly worried.

I see an anti-migrant sentiment beginning to seethe. I see political malaise; an absence of courage, a bankruptcy of leadership, and a paucity of moral sensitivity.

I see a one-sided debate, focusing on fear, negativity and security. Where are the smiles of welcome from last summer? Where are the banners in football grounds declaring “Migrants Welcome”? I know they are there, and I know they will be seen again when we gather in cities and towns across the globe with candles of solidarity. The common sense and generosity of ordinary people, of communities made up of migrants and non-migrants, people of all shades of color, politics and piety – that is what sustains me.

I truly believe that communities will continue to open their hearts and arms to embrace the oppressed. While some national leaders may cavil, the United Nations, informed by a global grassroots debate, has drawn a line under the importance of migration in its blueprint for human development - the Sustainable Development Goals.

Migration is firmly on the global agenda. The first United Nations side event on Migration took place this year. A summit in Malta brought African and European leaders together around migration. In Asia, governments have gathered to seek a regional solution to the migration crisis in the Andaman Sea. Canada’s new government has sounded a clarion call, taking 25,000 Syrian refugees in a rapid, regulated and welcome mass intake.

I have often described our time as a perfect storm of humanitarian emergencies which factor in today’s unprecedented human mobility. Almost one out of every seven human beings on this planet is in some way a migrant. That is over a billion people. But almost 60 million of them have been forced to leave their homes and the places they grew up.

Millions of others are migrants seeking opportunity in other countries, or elsewhere within their own countries, just as anyone would.

What makes this a perfect storm is the unprecedented hostility and fear that this is engendering in so many places. What city cannot be said to have thrived from migrant enterprise? But to read the invective against these victims of war and violence, and see how it spreads so easily across the world, makes me worry about where humanity is headed.

Now is the time for safe, secure and legal migration throughout the world.

Many have been arguing for a long time that to address the issues around human mobility, we require the management of migration, with security for all involved. We must recognize that migration is the megatrend of our time, and we need to treat it with seriousness, not smears, if we're going to get anywhere.

Migrants are moving and the world needs them. But the world also needs leadership in order to manage them in a safe, secure and legal manner. It is high time for mature societies to show that they will do what it takes to make this marriage work.

Yes, there is darkness. But we all have a little light. Let it shine.#
